Cracking down on illegal robocalls

When an unfamiliar number appears on your phone, chances are you hesitate before answering – I know I do. It's an understandable reaction considering Americans received an estimated 4.3 billion robocalls last month alone. The sheer volume is staggering, and the illegal robocall scams are costing consumers an average of $25 billion every year.

This is an issue I'm familiar with. I previously worked through the Energy and Commerce (E&C) Committee to advance two pieces of legislation, including the Stopping Bad Robocalls Act and the bipartisan Combating Pandemic Scams Act, which President Trump signed into law to help Americans identify and report telemarketing, internet, and robocall fraud.

These calls are annoying, and criminals effectively use them to steal identities, drain bank accounts, and prey on seniors and other vulnerable Americans. We're distrusting our phones more and more, causing people to ignore legitimate calls from doctors, schools, and even family members.

On July 22, the House E&C Committee's Communications and Technology Subcommittee held a hearing to examine how Congress can better protect Americans from illegal robocalls and strengthen our communications networks.

A proposal before the Subcommittee was the bipartisan Foreign Robocall Elimination Act. It would unite federal agencies and industry experts to identify the origins of foreign scam calls, trace criminals, assess damage, and prevent more calls from entering American networks.

Good data informs good policy, and Congress must work to ensure commonsense legislation that should give federal officials the tools necessary to catch scammers. But we need to ensure the solution does not create new burdens for legitimate callers that follow the rules.

But as technology continues to evolve and scammers look for new ways to exploit people, it's up to Congress to keep pace with commonsense protections that safeguard consumers.
